Editor's Note

The Undergraduate Review showcases the best of St. John Fisher College's undergraduate research. This year's edition was no exception, ranging in subjects from Psychology to Biology, and from Marketing to Political Science. Topics included but were not limited to: Chinese political leadership, effects of news media language on sexual assault victim precipitation, slave literacy in the Pre-Civil War era, the new sales approach of mobile gaming, and the advances of 3-D printing technology.

To all of the students who submitted articles for this year's edition, you have my sincerest gratitude. I deeply appreciate every student who submitted an article, as The Review received the largest amount of submissions to date. My job as the editor was made difficult from the beginning, because I had a wide range of high-quality submissions to choose from. I can only hope that next year's editor has just as much difficulty as I did- having too many submissions is the best problem to have as an editor. I also extend my gratitude to Dr. Oliver Griffin, for his helpful advice and kind guidance in the editing process, and to the Lavery Library staff, for their infallible patience with me as I stumbled through the publication process.

I would also like to thank St. John Fisher College's Student Government Association, for funding and supporting extensive advertisement and helping me spread the word around campus about The Undergraduate Review. My thanks are also sent to the Cardinal Courier, St. John Fisher College's student-run newspaper, which published advertisements for article submissions on behalf of The Undergraduate Review.

My heartfelt congratulations are sent to the students whose articles were selected for this year's edition. Your diligence and hard work is what made the Spring 2015 edition the best to date, and I am truly grateful to have had such an interesting and diverse group of topics to review. This has been a valuable and enjoyable learning experience for me; it was a privilege to have been the editor of a journal that sheds light to some of the highest quality work completed at St. John Fisher College.
