Appeared in the issue: Volume 10, Number 2, Spring 1965.

placed the body of the child upon the stone and surrendered her right to its life. Her son she placed upon the stone.

There was a feeble light in the horizon just beginning to assert its presence as she walked homeward. The sun, like a glowing coal struggling for life, rolled and trembled in the sky. Now its moment had arrived and it burst into radiance."

Struggle

Life often sparkles and shines.
Then suddenly I close my door
And fall into the night.
There I wander aimlessly
Until I find the stairs.
Then I climb and climb;
Finally I reach the top
And happily burst outdoors.

J. R. PIKE

And I,
in the dawning stillness of your eyes live reflected,
reflecting on the unideanness of you.
