placed the body of the child upon the stone and surrendered her right to its life. Her son she placed upon the stone.

There was a feeble light in the horizon just beginning to assert its presence as she walked homeward. The son, like a glowing coal struggling for life, rolled and trembled in the sky. Now its moment had arrived and it burst into radiance."

Struggle

Life often sparkles and shines.
Then suddenly I close my door
And fall into the night.
There I wander aimlessly
Until I find the stairs.
Then I climb and climb;
Finally I reach the top
And happily burst outdoors.

J. R. PIKE

And I,
in the dawning stillness of your eyes live reflected,
reflecting on the unideanness of you.
