WISDOM STARS

His eyes seem to be shooting off firecrackers
Like the finale of a 4th of July display Alternating one and then the other Then several times over To others they appear More like puls—ing yel—low Lights on a railroad crossing sign
The difference—the glimmer, only she is able to see Reminding her of the stars above

She looks to them for answers and inspiration
As they twin—kle one by one Almost as if they are winking Trying to tell her something If only she could interpret the meaning

RIPPLED WATERS

Standing on the aged, sable brown planks of the deck in the early hours of the day, just as the sun awakens and begins to raise its head, its beam of beauty outnumbers the fog amid the cool, damp day. The smell of the morning dew upon the velvet grass and the perfume of the earth's breath, induces a sense of tranquility and remembrance. The image of my sister and me swimming in the waist-deep water, surrounded by seaweed covered boulders, sparks a memory of innocence.
Looking back on the games of Marco Polo and the handstands performed underneath the lemon grass green water, I shed a tear, for I know we are no longer children.
