On a path—south to north—
I flow in and out of slow and speedy currents.
I dip above the water’s surface.
I sink below the undertow, and drink tea with the rocks that form the riverbed.
I stand on a slate rock overlooking the small drop and dive into the murky water—cleansed in midair.
The rumbling sound of water meeting the small pool
drowns out the world, and I’m thinking about the people, the moments, the places I’ve left behind
in the curves, bends,
and flow of this river.
I’m looking ahead to the new rhythm of flow, the new river of life, while I sit on the seat of forgetting and remembering.
