Exhaust

February and the snow's worn out everywhere stained by dogs, exhaust the glint of menacing fangs these lengthening icicles harden, heart braces for an arrow's stab, wear it on your sleeve just once still, the empty crystal vase waits for a single flower touched tonight only by the moon's unflattering light, an old scarecrow bows to the west wind. Tracking his master's scent, a black dog a wind-blown red leaf pressed against the pane—his kiss on her perfumed wrist leaving a wet circle on the white tablecloth, a glass intact amid the rubble of one more façade—a small miracle

just one step, she said, a slow stroll from this world into that other one, see the strange I's. Take two steps: beware sun's glare on new skin under a cool white nightie, like a sliver of moon, thinned to soft gauze over her elbows, remembering a catalogue of lines—and contours defining the body’s shape: lobes, lips, nipples . . .

an old trick, counting toes and fingers, waiting for the eleventh hour

in the stalled duplicity of cells splitting and binding

I was dreaming—what was I dreaming, tell me, when the blue curtains yawned?

A black horse, her fast canter trampling the raw grass, tender crocuses blooming—by slow degrees they turn to drink in clear sunlight pools of heat, closer now: oh spring, can we start to believe?

MICHÉLLE BOPP

Desperately I clamber for what remains, I find myself too late.

Lost in violence and tears, no final call for help.

“Try to live without me!”
Words throb; fists curl.

My face lit by the moon, vulnerable and exposed.

Unforgiving darkness bites, slaps, only fear exasperates.

Silent pleading goes unnoticed.
Anguish gropes.
