2009

You Knew The Odds

Julie Scott

St. John Fisher College
You Knew The Odds
You knew the odds of failure from the start, that morning you sliced that fresh piece of clay from the cool, wet brick, otherwise known as opening a fresh notebook and pressing a newly sharpened pencil to the page.
It never comes out as you see it in your head – when you were inspired by some unknown Figment of your imagination as time was passing with its hectic speed of motion.
Broken shards of pottery spewn around the room from previous experiences of unaccomplished productions for your inspired imagination.
But this time you think it will be different.

Scraping, spinning, carving, spinning over and over again – as your lifeless mound develops into a creation beyond your wildest dreams.
Fingers slide over fingers which wouldn’t normally touch, with tiny pieces of dried clay scratching your skin, as that sharp pencil scrapes the page until it becomes dull, much like your creation over time.